Xs have always been native to India and have been a part of Indian culture for centuries.

Y was a military general who of the Portuguese established colonies in India in the 15th centuries. Naturally, the colonizers had their eyes on the native Indian X and lots were exported to Europe.

However, Y and the European elites had a different taste and they preferred their X to be firm and sweet so that they could be cut and served on the tables.

This is where the Portuguese started using the technique grafting on X plants. They would eventually stumble upon a variant that was to the liking of Y, naming the variant after him.
